Learning Styles: Multimodal

Life is multimodal. There are seldom instances where one mode is used exclusively, or is sufficient. Those who prefer many modes almost equally are of two types. There are those who are context specific, who choose a single mode to suit the occasion or situation. There are others who are not satisfied until they have had input (or output) in all of their preferred modes. They take longer to gather information from each mode and, as a result, they often have a deeper and broader understanding. Students who are multimodal learners benefit from combining strategies from two or three of the other learning styles. Choose your top 2 or 3 highest-scoring learning styles, and look at the handouts for those.

Information taken in part from:
- Becoming a Master Student Concise, 12th ed., by Dave Ellis